Crossing cultural borders or ignoring their existence?
Dr. Caroline Williams, University of Technology, Sydney

Biographers bring to their subject their own background and entrenched thinking. To write a biography of the influential 20th century philosopher and shaper of modern thought, Jiddu Krishnamurti, was for me an exploration in discarding the past to recognize the present.

Where does one begin a paper addressed to readers as individuals about the biography of Jiddu Krishnamurti? I would suggest the same place as before the writing of the biography: the dark. The dark past. It was fortunate for me that the subject of my biography was the dark. His name was Krishna, which means 'poller of hearts' (Frosterstein: 150) and also carries various meanings associated with darkness, black or dark blue and the pupil of the eye (Gandhi: 206). According to Frosterstein, the earliest record of the name is to be found in the Rig-Veda (8.74), referring to a sage, and later (8.85) to a monster. I was feeling about this, in the dark, doing my daily meditation, and I came upon an idea, or it came upon my mind. Was it a Western idea or an Eastern idea? Feeling my way in the dark, within a blindness, I touched upon the idea of writing about an Easterner within a Western tradition of enquiry, as research towards a Doctoral degree. I found Krishna - or he found me. This particular Krishna was called a 'model of Krishna', Krishna-murti, or the form, the visible manifestation of the deity (Frosterstein: 151), a model of Krishna in the Ikhta family. Jiddu Krishnamurti. There was a lyrical description in his Sanskrit horoscope probably written on a palm leaf in 1895: "the gem of a son ... [born under] the full moon to the ocean of Ikhta family" (Theosophist April 1932: 42). When I'd completed the Doctorate, and had created in the form of a biography a model of the life of this model of Krishna, I wondered about the act, or at times seemingly endless series of acts (was there any space between them?) of citation. And about its relation to my past thinking.
